Maine is a state so proud of herself people from around the country can be found basking in all her beauty and glory. She is the home of real, earthy people who have watched her change decade after decade.

As a native Mainer I have watched my home state grow both in population and in culture. Our culture is rich with all walks of life. Politically, religiously and every other way imaginable. Mainers are proud and take calling Maine home very seriously.

When out of staters complain that mountains and camp sites don't offer amenities such as cell reception and toilets we scoff at these tourists. Isn't the point of vacationing here to experience nature as it is intended.

Permitting a group of hunters the right to strip away a creature who is already being robbed of its habitats in so many other ways seems hypocritical and even anti Maine. How can we so proudly represent this glorious state and at the same time kill one of our true innocent wild life?

The way life should be not just for humans but for all forms of life.
