If a manufacturer is required to make repair information, tools and parts available to independent repair providers, it would have negative effects on authorized dealers of the manufacturer.

First, if independent repair providers can access the same repair information and tools as authorized dealers, without fulfilling the requirements to be an authorized dealer, they may depreciate the value of products by completing poor service at a lower cost. This could result in reduced revenue for authorized dealers, as customers may choose to go to independent repair providers instead.

Second, manufacturers distribute products and parts through an authorized dealer network and have no infrastructure in place to sell directly to end users.

Finally, if independent repair providers can access repair information and tools without completing authorized dealer requirements regarding training, inventory stocking levels, marketing, selling new products, it creates an unfair advantage against the authorized dealer.

Overall, the requirement for manufacturers to make repair information and tools and parts available to independent repair providers would have negative effects on authorized dealers and go against the dealer protection laws that have been established through years of hard work and negotiation.
