

Matthew Allen
Skowhegan
LD 2157

I don't feel that the location of these stores is the problem. I work for a tobacco retailer in Maine and we follow a drastically different model for all sales. That's what is needed. If EVERY retailer not just here but nationwide adopted a stricter sales policy we could stop all the nonsense about location and flavor bans. We card and scan for EVERY single transaction. If someone underage is getting product from our stores they are certainly not getting it from us. We get a lot of grief from our customers over it but the simple truth is there is 0 chance of us selling to a minor or even having them in our store. Law says they can enter at 18 but not purchase anything? Not here. If you're not 21 you're not entering our place of business. You'll never stop people from buying for their kids or buddies who are too young unless you start implementing serious penalties on them. And before trying to ban flavored products, which have been around since the first pipe tobaccos, why not demand these companies making vapes to lower the nicotine levels. We sell disposable vapes that carry way more nicotine than cigarettes. The vape isn't the problem. Neither is the flavor. It's the amount of nicotine in the products. The FDA should step in and do something about that. If I want to smoke something that's berry flavor so be it. But it does not have to contain exorbitant amounts of nicotine. But that too is out of the retailer's control. Crack down on the manufacturer. Maine stopped companies from shipping that stuff in unless they're an approved entity. Now tell them they can ship the lower level products instead. Or not send their products here.