The idea of a wait list makes sense from a surface view, but once you look into it, it's discriminatory in nature. The second amendment is crucial for the security of the people of the United States from tyranny, no matter the source. It is crucial for this right to extend to all people regardless of sex, race or class. A 72 hour waiting period discriminates against the lower class. People who wish to use their constitutional right to own a firearm would be disenfranchised if they do not own a car, or are unable to secure time off to make an additional trip to a licensed dealer. This disproportionately affects individuals in a lower economic standing. I am for equality in every aspect of the law, and that includes the second amendment especially, because of it's ability to provide strength to marginalized organizations, from patriot militias at our nation's founding to civil rights organizations such as the Black Panthers. Forcing people to drive long distances to polling offices is discrimination for the 15th amendment, but not the 2nd?

I understand that due to events of the past year emotions are high, but when emotions are strong, logic and reason are not. Times are crisis are often used to pass laws that would never pass when people are thinking clearly, whether it be the suspension of habeas corpus, or the invasion of our privacy through surveillance, you cannot let fear get in the way of your rights.
