I agree that everyone should have a right to make their own decisions about their health based on informed consent. This Act does not limit a person's ability to make informed decisions about what gets put into their body. It promotes public health by limiting those who choose not to participate in herd immunity of preventable diseases from participating in (providing OR receiving) public services. I particularly do not support health care professionals who request exemptions from vaccinations to be allowed to work in immunity-compromised environments, thereby endangering our community instead of helping it, as their profession is intended to do. It's at best hypocritical, and at worst recklessly endangering.
