My fiance and I became very familiar with the tailspin your life and livelihood goes into when you discover your land is potentially contaminated with PFAS.

We had lived on our dream property for about 3 months we discovered it had been licensed as a site for spreading sludge and winter stacking the 90's. I run a small flower farm and we had big plans for setting up a homestead. So many plans took a pause.

We spent weeks waiting for tests results making plans b-d.

We were fortunate that our test back back with low levels of PFAS.

But we feel deeply for farms that are facing complete loss of livelihood and home.

The burden of this should not fall on the shoulder of these farmer's.

The responsibility for this damage lies with the State of Maine.
