

Michael Landry
Bangor

This whole pandemic has been more physically and mentally draining than the public realizes. Yes, everyone has a job to do and, yes, we get paid for it, but the amount of extra precautions and chores and paperwork piled upon us due to the pandemic regulations has been monumental. And since everyone else is collecting unemployment, we're woefully understaffed and our bodies are at their limits. But if that weren't enough, can you imagine going to work and wondering if you're not a carrier of a virus that might kill your coworker's new baby and you don't even know it?