I fully support LD101. I'm a 18 year old fifth generation lobster fisherman. Offshore windmills are a very big concern as I try to build my business, all of the time and money I put into it might be for nothing. The jobs that the windmills will create will only be for a short time, but all the multigenerational commercial fishermen that the windmill projects will displace have been around for a very long time and more then likely will still be there for more generations, unless windmills are built. Lobster fishermen can't just move out of an area if windmills are put up, there are seven different zones that lobstermen can fish and within those zones there are small areas that you can fish without being interfered with. The trickle down effect on the entire state would be enormous not only on the fishing industry (trap shops, lobster buying stations, and bait dealers), it would come down to car dealerships, grocery stores, and much more, if windmills displaced fishermen. Windmills in general don't pay themselves off before they need to be rebuilt. Windmills are also supposed to be environmentally friendly, but just think about all of the fuel that these ships would be burning to just install one and run the wires. Windmills will not only disrupt the ecosystem of the Gulf of Maine, they don't make sense to put offshore. Offshore windmills are bad for the entire State of Maine.
