

Cassidy Jackson
Searsport
LD 716

Coyote hunting is very crucial to Maine's population of wildlife more importantly whitetail deer. With a limited season we would see an increase in coyote populations which would cause the whitetail deer population to decline and when there is a increase in one species it causes resource depletion that can lead to a disease. This could cause the coyotes to become more populated in areas of the state we normally don't see them and they could start to become more of a threat to our communities and pets. There is already an abundance of coyotes in Maine and limiting the season would be a mistake.