Requiring vehicles to be inspected in Maine and then farming the inspections out to local garages where most of their income is made from repairs is astonishingly a bad idea and I have had problems with this. One year I had my car inspected at 4 different garages and each one told me something different was wrong and repairs were needed before my car would pass. Lucky enough one of my neighbors retired from D.O.T. We looked the car over and he assured me it was road worthy. Each garage that I returned to did even look the car over again when and said it passed when he explained who he was. This can not be a one time thing.

We are one of the last few states that require these inspections. The federal government hasn't required them for a very long time.

I'm tired of going through this sham, it is long past due to eliminate inspections.
