I think having a trail to connect these three towns is important for multiple reasons. First, it allows residents to use it for exercise which is important especially during the winter months when outside activities are limited. Second, it gives an alternate route for transportation between towns that are safer for those without a vehicle. Lastly, the access these trails give to the public is underrated because so much of Maine's beautiful corridors are blocked by private land. This allows the average Mainer to enjoy and learn more about the place they live.
