

Danielle Chabot
Biddeford/Lyman

About a year ago I moved to Maine to work for a caregiver who was willing to give me a chance on a new beginning. Within the year the information I have learned about the different kinds, uses and benefits has been astronomical and as a medical cannabis patient myself I've always been very interested in a plant that can benefit the world in such a large way and to be able to turn this into my career is truly amazing. Not to mention the fact that I get to positively effect hundreds of people's life's daily by giving them medical relief from their daily struggles. When I see a patient who's smiling from ear to ear because I'm handing them they're medicine is absolutely amazing, I'm making a difference. Already as it is people struggle with money, cannabis isn't covered by insurance so why should a patient be punished with larger prices because they choose to put something natural into their bodies? If cannabis grows can't meet the demand these people suffer. Cannabis growers are just regular people trying to make a difference and to raise prices or put more restrictions does nothing but slows down the process and growing a sufficient plant is already a pretty lengthy process. So really, who's winning?