

Hayden Stokes
Gorham

In my opinion they should absolutely increase the plant count for both mature and immature plants for caregivers in Maine. The medical market is exploding and this will only help meet the demand of the patients. It eases a lot of pains in many caregivers growing styles where they are forced to cultivate older, larger plants to compete w the larger license producers within their plant count. Doubling the current count to 60 mature plants would at least help a little and allow caregivers to choose a healthier more productive cultivation method with younger, healthier, more explosive plants by having more, smaller, plants.

From a financial perspective it also will only allow the state to collect more money in taxes, as more of the unmet demand of patients will be met, and more retail and wholesale transactions will result.